Meet Mary

It was one month into Mary's first year of high school when her parents started to notice that something was a little off. Mary seemed tired and lethargic all the time and she had a hard time keeping any food down.

When Mary spoke up at a doctor visit, to say she couldn't see anything out of her left eye, her mom, Kery, took her straight to the emergency room at Children's—where two tumors were discovered. Mary began emergency chemotherapy immediately.

"Dr. Janss happened to be on call, which was a blessing because she's the most incredible doctor in the world, and she's the most experienced with this type of tumor—not just at Children's, but probably in the United States. Maybe even the world," her dad, Whitney says.

Neuro-oncologist Anna Janss, MD, who treated Mary, quickly took notice of how special she is. "She just shoots for the moon. Nothing stops her."

Mary truly is unstoppable. She has completed treatment and her first set of scans came back clear. She even got her full vision back—an incredibly rare occurrence. She's back at school, active in clubs and marching band, and was chosen to be the homecoming representative for the 10th grade by her peers.

Mary has some words of encouragement for other kids out there who are hoping for miracles of their own. She says, "Even when it seems like it's impossible, you just have to believe in yourself."
